Melbourne JD Outstanding Employment Outcomes

A survey of 2016 Melbourne Law School Juris Doctor (JD) graduates shows strong employment results with 95 per cent of those surveyed in employment. Of those employed, 70 per cent are working as legal graduates (trainees with law firms, solicitors, or judges' associates) and many others are working in other legal or generalist graduate roles.

The survey, taken 18 months after completion of the Melbourne JD, reveals that more than 120 employers from the legal and non-legal sectors employed our graduates. These employers include international and national law firms, courts, community legal centres, government departments, statutory bodies and firms in the private sector, demonstrating the diverse range of careers our graduates go into.

The survey had a response rate of 79 per cent. This means the data is robust and gives a realistic picture of employment outcomes. The employers are listed in the following pages. The class of 2016 survey results are consistent with the strong results for the class of 2015, which had an employment rate of 96 per cent 18 months after graduation.

“It is not only the academic skills, but the practical skills I learned during my study at Melbourne Law School that have helped me in my career. These skills not only helped me get a job in the commercial legal sector, but have also ensured I can make unique and valuable contributions in my workplace.”

Understanding the survey results

In recent years there has been considerable media attention given to employment outcomes for law graduates. While the Australian Government Department of Education and Training publishes data about the job outcomes of Australian university students, this is collected only four months after graduation and does not include detailed information about the types of jobs that graduates obtain.

We know that while some students find employment directly after law school, others can take longer to do so. Many law graduates can still be completing their practical legal training (PLT) at this time.

In order to provide a clearer picture of career outcomes, Melbourne Law School undertakes an annual survey of graduates, 18 months after completion of their degree

To help you understand the language used in the graphs:

- 'Legal graduate positions' include those employed as a graduate trainee, a solicitor or a judge's associate.
- 'Other legal roles' include positions such as paralegals and legal researchers, often working with law firms or with barristers.
- 'Other graduate positions' are formal programs primarily in the government and business sectors. A law degree is not a requirement of the role but may increase a graduate's competitiveness for the position.
- 'Other general roles' include a diverse range of positions that are not part of a formal graduate program and might not require a law degree.

Data collection summary

Melbourne Law School publishes the Careers Outcomes survey annually in the interest of providing accurate information about job opportunities for both current and future students.

The results rely on the veracity of the data reported to us but are also correlated with data from other sources, for example, from our annual interviews with law firms and other organisations where graduates work. We believe the results provide a broadly accurate overview of the careers outcomes for our graduates in recent years.

The fact that we have certain outcomes in a given year does not guarantee that those results will be consistent over time; the employability for law graduates may fluctuate depending on the economy and other factors.
