Creators' Rights: Visiting Fellowships for early career scholars at Melbourne Law School

The Intellectual Property Research Institute of Australia (IPRIA) has opened applications for funded visiting Fellowships to be held across the calendar years of 2020 and 2021.

These Fellowships are intended to support outstanding emerging researchers to conduct innovative research into creators' rights in the outstanding research environment of the Melbourne Law School. This is a unique opportunity to travel to Australia, connect with like-minded colleagues and develop ideas in a collegial and supportive environment.

These opportunities arise via an Australian Research Council Future Fellowship project led by A/Prof Rebecca Giblin. The Author's Interest Project is investigating how taking creators' rights seriously can help get them paid and reclaim lost culture. The research team has a particular interest in reversion rights, but applications will be accepted in any area related to improving the lot of creators. The opportunity is open to scholars in any field, and we expect it to be of particular interest to those in law, economics, creative economics and publishing studies.

Find out more about the Author's Interest project at authorsinterest.org and authorsinterest.org/research.

Eligibility: applicants must be within 10 years of completion of their PhD, or 10 years of commencing an academic position (whichever comes first). Time can be added for any significant career interruptions.

The Fellowships: Fellows will be integrated into the life of the law school during their visit, as well as participate in IPRIA events and seminars. They will be expected to eventually publish a piece of research related to creators' rights that was developed during their visit.

Funding: up to AUD $4,000 will be considered towards the costs of accommodation and travel to Melbourne. Successful applicants will be notified of their exact funding offer together with outcomes.
